

Let Not the Ripples of Illusion

Let Not the Ripples of Illusion

Let not the ripples of illusion inundate you as their precedence goes before the great change. It is most often in this manner, in the expression of finiteness, that there are those reactions or those efforts on the parts of (what could be called) the status quo to resist change. It would be no different than attempting to tell a mighty oak tree to hold onto its leaves through the coming winter season; it is not created to do that. Neither are you, each of you, created to hold onto the past in a manner that limits the future.

Be brave. Step forward. And reach into the, seeming, unknown that is immediately before you. And you will be gladdened of heart and mind when you realize the great gifts of joy and wonder that await you. And it is, as with the oak tree, that some of the past events, habits, memories, and so forth must be released to their source, where they can be reborn anew.

You stand before a time of calling that from within. Do this with a joyful heart. All is well. See?"
20121031