The Expectant Ones Series – Reading # 44

Given at the beginning of the reading 20070302

Jacob's passing was by his own choice upon the mount called the Lookout Mount. And from there, he passed with the closure of that day, setting his own spirit free to soar into the embrace of the darkness of night.

Iliam followed the path with those who were carrying the works and teachings and performing the healing works for those who sought them, until that time as his body became weary. He then called out and was lifted up by those with whom he served in that lifetime. And these are those here, speaking.

Eloise and the Sisters, including Sarah and many others, made their way slowly, purposefully, back along the pathway on which the Master walked and taught and did His works, and then into the wilderness, then to the three Holy Mountains, and then to the Sacred Spring of healing. Here they celebrated. They gave thanks to God and performed their sacred dance one last time. Upon the completion, they paused to pray and break bread and wine. And gazing at the dimming fire and the light of the sky on the glistening water of the healing spring, they clasped hands and departed. They were, and are, received by those whom their loving hands nurtured. And He lifted them up in His gladness.

And each of the others, including the guardians and the ancient teachers, in their own time were so embraced as they were met at the point of crossing, and each one was given unto them according to that which they had wrought in that lifetime. And there was a glorious coming together and rejoicing, such that this can yet be heard by those who travel forth with gladness in heart.

There followed that period of time wherein the spirits, as it might be said, of their eternal nature came to know themselves once again in the completeness of their faith. And in this knowing, that faith grew. And in the growth of that united faith, there came to be placed a marker in the heavens—that all who would seek might be illuminated by this, and their path made open and passable... and yet does it shine.

There followed then the movement on the part of the individuals and groupings to continue with the Promise and the service unto those who were seeking to carry the Word forward, that ever, would there be one who might fall and ask and raise up a hand, there would be one at the ready to clasp it and lift them up.

And then there came those times where certain of the Expectant Ones moved back into positions of direct service in the Earth. Others chose to move into the Earth by way of taking on physical form and doing various works. As it would be naturally expected to follow, that after the Master's life was not seen and known in the sense that one might remember it as one sees a face or hears a voice, turmoil followed, and conflict, and challunge upon challenge; and ever they walked among them seeking to continue the word and the peace.

All the while, there were those overseers and those of the Elders whose position was made even more glorious and joyful, as they had served with and walked with our Brother, the Master. And so here then they joined with him who guards the Path and guards The Way that there could be prepared an opportunity when the Path was ready, and those who bore the mark might awaken; that from that awakening, there would be the manna, the nourishment, of their spirits.

And then they would send those who were to mingle with those in flesh—some to take on flesh themselves, and others to walk in their midst silently. And the Master called forth the Light once again and set it in place, and in the form of seven great waves of light did He put before them the steps for them to return to oneness with God.

Some gathered together that their lives might be all the brighter, and that their truth and their faith would be a beacon of hope and promise to others; and that others yet afar and near, would do the same in their own teaching in their way and manner. And thus would come that time when the gates would open and the paths would be made aright, and He would stand before them with gladness in heart.

And He would, as He shall, call them.
